BHRD ORGANIZATION AND FUNCTIONS FLYER

FUNCTIONS

The Bureau of Health Resources Development (BHRD) was established in July 1973 as a major component of the Health Resources Administration (HRA) in a reorganization of the U.S Department of Health, Education, and Welfare's Public Health Service Programs.

The Bureau consists of four divisions from the former Bureau of Health Manpower Education--the divisions of Medicine, Dentistry, Nursing and Associated Health Professions--and two from the former Health Services and Mental Health Administration--the divisions of Comprehensive Health Planning and Facilities Utilization (Hill-Burton). [redacted] is being administered by BHRD as its seventh division. The Bureau was transferred from the National Institutes of Health into the newly former HRA as part of the reorganization.

BHRD provides leadership and administration of Department programs concerned with the Nation's health resources [redacted] An effort is under way to find solutions to the pressing health problems of [redacted] cost, and quality of care.

The Bureau focuses on production, utilization, distribution, and rationalization of human and physical resources in the health services field. Manpower activity centered in BHRD assures maximum capability for research, demonstration, and program management. It provides a single administrative professional setting for manpower education, training, task analyses, continuing education, and such special activities as those related to geographic and speciality maldistribution.
